JACKAROO A MEMOIR
BY MICHAEL THORNTON

From choirboy to cowboy… In 1967, fresh from boarding school humiliations, and having lost his father to alcoholism, gangly teen Michael Thornton was packed off to a tough sheep and cattle station to work as a jackaroo. He was to learn the wool trade from the lamb up, under a boss legendary for working his farmhands in an almost military regimen.

Tasked with the dirty, disgusting and downright dangerous jobs, jackaroos are the dogsbodies of our farms. But at Habbies Howe, in central Victoria, somewhere between castrating lambs with his teeth and hauling back breaking bags of fertiliser for no obvious purpose, Michael discovered inner strength, and the friendship and male role models he’d craved.

He also earned respect—enough to later walk into a job with the nation’s most famous farmer, the Defence Minister and future Prime Minister PM, Malcolm Fraser.

Text taken from the back of his book, thanks to John Rutter for sending it in.

Student of the Week

Kendall: For a fantastic effort on camp; pushing herself outside her comfort zone and trying everything, always with a smile on her face! Well done!

Wool Shed Dance:
Julia, Robyn and I were able to meet this week and debrief about this fundraising event. We have had numerous positive emails from people who attended, congratulating everyone on a terrific night. The amount of work to organise such an event is huge and I thank all the families involved. Special thanks to Julia and Robyn. The total funds raised from the Wool Shed Dance were $3440—an amazing effort!

Senior Camp:
What a fantastic week we had! It was an absolute pleasure to take the seniors away and watch them participate and enjoy all the opportunities Camp Allambie had to offer. Some activities were extremely challenging and designed to push students out of their comfort zone.

Expression of Interest
Butterfly Festival Art Exhibition

Lepidoptera: This exhibition celebrates the beautiful and ephemeral invertebrate Family Lepidoptera (Moths and Butterflies). Aside from their beauty these insects also provide critical ecosystem services such as pollination in agricultural, bushland and urban landscapes. They in turn are an important food source for birds and other fauna. Artists are invited to submit ideas for works which:

Are inspired by invertebrates such as Moths and Butterflies

May also explore conceptually some of the broader issues around ecosystem services, biodiversity, climate change, food security and changing land use patterns across Australia

Exhibition Dates: Nov 17-25, 2012

HighLand ramblers
April’s ramble was to one of the prettiest spots I’ve seen in the Highlands, but Andrew should have warned us to bring ropes and hobnail boots! It started off innocently enough with a gentle stroll along the old coach road to the tree carved with the initials of the road builders in 1887. Then downhill towards Story creek, the last bit being a very steep slope with loose rocks, slippery grass and nothing to grab onto but the euphemistically-named Prickly currant-bush, which really ought to be called Fiendishly spiky currant-bush. However the falls when we reached them were worth it – a sheer drop of 10 metres or so into a large tranquil pool. A scramble back out after lunch – I don’t think I was the only one on all fours, ending with a stroll through Helen & Bruce’s property enjoying their beautiful views.

BITS OF BOTANY AND BIRDS
Prickly currant-bush
Coprosma quadrifida
I’ve seen Prickly currant-bushes in small numbers in various places in the Highlands, but the last ramblers’ walk was the only place I’ve seen lots, or taken much notice of them. (I think I’ve got all the splinters out now.) It’s an untidy-looking shrub; often quite short though can grow to 2 metres, with small branches. In summer it has tiny red leaves and long spikes on the branches. In summer it has tiny red-orange fruit which are apparently quite tasty. It prefers moist conditions.
